Coaxial cable is commonly used in various communication systems to interconnect separate locations or subsystems. For example, coaxial cable can be used to connect a television signal in a home or other building to a cable box for relaying the signal to a television for viewing. The coaxial cable is connected to coaxial cable connectors that are attached to interface ports on the cable box, so that the signals in the coaxial cable can be relayed to the cable box for processing before being relayed to a television for display. The coaxial cables used in such applications are typically standardized cables having a standard coaxial cable connector. For example, a standard industry connector is illustrated in FIG. 1. As shown, a coaxial cable connector 100 is attached to a standard industry-standard coaxial cable 102. Cable connector 100 includes a male connector portion 104 that
