Far-right and ultra-nationalist groups have been stepping up their activism in recent months to press President Andrzej Duda to end what they say are the economic advantages that Poles enjoy from living in multi-cultural societies. The “Polish National Movement” which wants to create “identity, national, cultural and spiritual unity” wants the government to pass a new law requiring foreigners to get two-year resident permits that would require permission to leave the country. On Tuesday, the group organized a march across a bridge leading to the Polish capital of Warsaw. The protesters were confronted with a small group of anti-fascist protesters, one of whom was hit in the face by a bag. A shot of the fight was later published on Facebook. The tensions at the bridge flared up after the border crossing with Slovakia was closed because a group of migrants from Ukraine and Belarus had attempted to cross the border, although they were turned back. The Far-right group has been operating alongside several other far-right groups in Poland in an effort to get the government to step up efforts to deport foreign workers. Although Polish companies and migrants have been calling for more human and financial aid for migrants, the nationalist groups and ultra-nationalist groups have been pressuring the government to enforce tougher laws to deport “foreigners”. A few days ago, one such group demanded that the government expropriate the mortgages of “foreigners.” In recent days, Polish activists have also been calling for the expulsion of foreign activists with extremist ties. The Polish government has been trying to end the influence that the country’s political and religious opposition has on society, including banning a political party and shutting down the media outlets that support them. Since 2016, “preventing the rise of extremist positions in Polish society” has become the official theme of the ruling Law and Justice Party.
