Comfort Edition) One method for detecting the presence of cholera in a fluid sample involves chemically modifying the cholera toxin protein. It has been known for some time that when cholera toxin is treated with formaldehyde, it loses its ability to bind to the ganglioside GM1. This loss of the ability to bind GM1 is a consequence of the formation of a reversible linkage between formaldehyde and the ganglioside binding sites of the toxin. In contrast, cholera toxin treated with methanol retains the ability to bind GM1. U.S. Pat. Nos. 4,847,224 and 5,055,430 disclose methods for detecting the presence of Vibrio cholera using an immunoassay which involves chemically modifying the V. cholera toxin protein. In the practice of the methods, one or more cholera toxin proteins are immobilized on a solid support. The modified toxin is reacted with a serum sample obtained from an individual suspected of having cholera. If the serum contains antibodies specific for the modified toxin, the modified toxin will be immobilized. The reaction of the modified toxin with the specific antibodies is detected by a method known to those skilled in the art. U.S. Pat. No. 5,638,917 discloses methods for detecting the presence of Vibrio cholerae O1 in a fluid sample. In one method the sample is treated with formaldehyde to modify the V. cholerae O1. A monoclonal antibody specific for the modified V. cholerae O1 is then applied to the sample. This method is based on the knowledge that formaldehyde is not required to effect the modification of the V. cholerae O1. In the absence of formaldehyde, a modified V. cholerae O1 cannot be detected with the monoclonal antibody, even though it may be present in the sample. In the presence of formaldehyde, however, the V. cholerae O1 can be detected by the monoclonal antibody. It has now been discovered that formaldehyde can be used in the modification of V. cholerae O1
