Hi, We have some issues with connection to the DNN Provider. 2. Is anyone experiencing a similar error? Code: CREATE DATABASE DNN_SITE CREATE TABLE DNN_SITE.DNN_SITE.LANGUAGE (Hi DNNers, I've worked with DNN 4 in previous versions and my previous experience was that DNN 4 will maintain the last login information of the usersystem by saving it in the database table 'dnn_userlogin_lastlogin' in the dnn_users table. This was also the case in DNN 3 and below. In DNN 4.00 and above, this information is NOT saved in the database table. The login data is stored in a new table called 'dnn_users_login' and the same data is stored in the table 'dnn_users' as well. This is the reason for the LoginInfo field to be disabled. 1) I am unable to find the 'dnn_users_login' table in my DNN install. 2) L... The six genera included in the family Corallinophycidae occur in several locations in the North Sea. In this study the diversification of the genera Scrippisia, Corallina and Rhodophyta was examined, taking into account the phylogenetic relationships within the family, the ecophysiological properties of the species and their macroalgal substrates. Phylogenetic analysis showed the presence of five clades within the family Corallinophycidae, among which the genera Rhodophyta and Scrippisia are the most derived. Analyses of ecophysiological data for the genus Rhodophyta showed that the higher dioecious species can be considered obligate outcrossers and therefore an obligate component in successful sexual reproduction. There are a few examples of dioecious species of the family Corallinophycidae. The predominance of monoecious species in this family is not surprising as obligate outcrossers are infrequent in plants. An analysis of the most relevant morphological characteristics in relation to their reproductive system revealed that the most conspicuous characteristics in the genus Corallina are the gonophores, whereas in the genus Scrippisia the branches, the axillary system and the axil, and the hair-like structures are the most important morphological characteristics. The results of this study show that at the interspecific level the genus Corallina is more closely related to Rhodophyta than to Scrippisia. At the intraspecific level, subclades with greater morphological variation appear in Corallina and Rhodophyta. These results show that the diversification of the gener
