Physiology and function of left-ventricular myocardial hibernation: metabolic aspects. Left-ventricular dysfunction due to a myocardial infarction in a large part can be explained by a decrease of myocardial oxygen consumption during diastole. Hypothermic cardioplegia can maintain adenosine triphosphate concentrations in myocardial tissue during longer periods of ischaemia, while reducing myocardial oxygen consumption. Partial myocardial hibernation of the infarcted myocardium is characterised by a metabolic dysfunction and a lack of mechanical activity, which are reversible. Partial myocardial hibernation can be defined by certain clinical and functional parameters, as well as by the increase of collateral blood flow during partial myocardial hibernation. Partial myocardial hibernation can be induced by different clinical or pharmacological procedures, or by ischaemia induced by hypothermic cardioplegia. Partial myocardial hibernation can be considered as a dormant stage of myocardial infarction. The clinical benefit of partial myocardial hibernation can be obtained through (i) preventing the deterioration of contractile dysfunction, (ii) preventing the development of regional scar tissue and (iii) possibly enhancing the salvage of jeopardised myocardium.
