The clinical, genetic, and immunologic features of familial thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura. Familial thrombotic thrombocytopenic purpura (TTP) is defined as an idiopathic thrombotic microangiopathy characterized by hemolytic anemia and thrombocytopenia caused by ADAMTS13 deficiency, with or without neurological symptoms. Despite the recent introduction of rituximab as a potential treatment option for refractory TTP, therapy has remained disappointing. The pathophysiology and clinical course of TTP may be variable, and only a subset of TTP patients presents with a classic phenotype characterized by acute clinical episodes, hematologic signs of hemolysis, and rapid onset of thrombocytopenia. TTP can be familial or sporadic; familial cases, with or without accompanying atypical features, seem to constitute a different disease entity than sporadic TTP. We present a comprehensive review of the genetics and immunopathogenesis of familial TTP. In addition to ADAMTS13 deficiency, other genetic and functional variants of ADAMTS13, mutations in genes encoding FABP (including alpha(1)-anti-trypsin), and autoantibodies directed against ADAMTS13 have been shown to predispose to TTP. TTP patients with a concurrent familial predisposition are likely to have more severe disease and early relapse after discontinuation of therapy, and a significant proportion of them are at increased risk of developing postthrombotic syndrome. Patients with ADAMTS13 deficiency should be treated with plasma exchange and alemtuzumab; in the absence of an adequate ADAMTS13 residual function, rituximab could be a valid option./* * Copyright (c) 2014-2016, NVIDIA CORPORATION.
