What's New In?

The present invention relates generally to the field of threading and more particularly to an improved method of rotating and driving a threaded member. In certain applications, it is necessary to rotate a threaded member, such as a screw, threaded rod, or the like, by means of a rotary drive which, when coupled to the threaded member, will cause the threaded member to rotate thereby. A number of existing rotary drives and drive systems have been developed to accomplish this task. For example, one common approach employs a stationary elongate base on which is mounted a threaded member. A nut is movably attached to the base and is adapted to be moved in a linear direction toward and away from the threaded member. As the nut is moved toward the threaded member, it will thread onto the threaded member, thereby rotatably driving the threaded member. Once the threaded member has reached a desired rotational position, the nut is moved away from the threaded member, whereupon the threaded member will remain at a desired rotational position. A number of problems, however, are associated with this type of apparatus. First, because the threaded member is free to move within the nut, the nut is not positively affixed to the threaded member, thereby allowing the nut to be jarred loose from the threaded member and/or the base. Second, in order to maintain the nut in a desired position relative to the threaded member, and therefor prevent the nut from being jarred loose, the nut must be biased with a spring or the like, which increases the cost and complexity of the apparatus. A second type of rotary drive which has been developed is adapted to prevent the nut from being jarred loose. This type of apparatus utilizes a drive member which is coupled to the nut and which includes one or more magnets. The magnets are attached to the nut and function to repel each other. Thus, when the nut is moved with respect to the threaded member, the magnets will repel each other, thereby maintaining the nut in the desired position and preventing the nut from being jarred loose. This type of apparatus, however, has a number of disadvantages. First, in order to locate the magnets in a desired position with respect to each other, the magnets must be positioned accurately with respect to each other, thereby adding to the complexity and cost of the apparatus. Second, the magnets are positioned at a specific distance from each other and, if the threaded member is not positioned at the center of the nut, the magnets will not be able to
