What's new in this version: * Improved many features. Absorbent articles, such as diapers, training pants, incontinence garments, sanitary napkins, and the like are well known in the art. Such absorbent articles typically have an absorbent pad made of a fibrous material, such as cellulose fibers or a synthetic resin fibers, sandwiched between a liquid pervious topsheet and a liquid impervious backsheet. When the article is worn, urine, menses, or other bodily fluids may contact the article and may pass through the topsheet and into the absorbent pad. However, the body fluid, especially menses, may have a high viscosity, which can cause a build-up of fluid pressure within the absorbent core of the absorbent article. To prevent the build-up of fluid pressure within the absorbent core, various methods have been developed which allow the rapid distribution of liquid throughout the absorbent core. For example, U.S. Pat. No. 4,047,531 (Kangas) describes an absorbent article which includes a plurality of discrete spaced apart apertures located in the topsheet and the body fluid can pass through these apertures into the absorbent core. Similarly, U.S. Pat. No. 4,940,519 (Ahuja et al.) describes an absorbent article having a plurality of discrete apertures located in a topsheet that are connected to an absorbent core by a conductive line. The apertures allow the body fluid to be distributed uniformly into the absorbent core of the article and out of the article through the topsheet. U.S. Pat. No. 5,149,344 (Boland et al.) describes an absorbent article having a continuous network of apertures located in the topsheet to rapidly distribute fluid into the absorbent core. The apertures described above
