Field of the Invention The present invention relates to a semiconductor device, and more particularly to the structure of a semiconductor device having a plurality of chips having different internal structures and different layout designs. 2. Description of the Related Art In recent years, increased integration and multiple functions in semiconductor devices have made it difficult to reliably produce a single large chip having a large capacity. To cope with this, a scheme of including several groups of identical chips on a wafer and cutting the wafer into the pieces each including at least one chip group has been employed. In this scheme, not all chips are required to have the same functions or structures. Therefore, wafers are divided into several groups of chips each having different function or structure. Since the group of chips have different internal structures and different layout designs, the chips included in the different groups need to be fabricated in a different process. Thus, the chips in different groups need to be subject to different process steps (e.g., etching, deposition of photoresist or the like), which makes the steps complicated and causes a reduction of the production efficiency. To avoid this, it may be considered that the chips having different functions or structures are fabricated in the same process. In this case, the same process needs to be applied to the chips having different functions or structures. However, different structures of the chip groups having different functions may cause a difference in time taken to conduct a certain process step. Therefore, the conventional scheme to fabricate the chips having different functions or structures in the same process may cause the increase of production costs and the reduction of production yield.Q: What
