The present invention relates generally to clamps for securing a partition or structural member to a wall or ceiling and, more particularly, to a clamp having a simple, inexpensive design and requiring only minimal operating force to clamp the partition or structural member to the wall or ceiling. Partition clamps or supports are used to maintain rigid partitions and other similar structural elements to a wall or ceiling, particularly to wall studs in building walls. These clamps are especially useful in maintaining a partition between adjacent rooms and are commonly used to secure firewalls or doors in areas of a building in which there is a high risk of a fire spreading. Firewalls, which are commonly made from sheet metal, are commonly used as both interior and exterior fire walls. Prior art partition clamps are typically designed to be mounted to the wall or ceiling by using holes cut into the wall or ceiling, which allow the clamp to be fastened to the wall or ceiling by inserting screws through the holes. If the wall or ceiling being attached to is a stud wall, the hole is drilled into the studs to facilitate mounting of the clamp. Prior art partition clamps that are mounted to the wall or ceiling are typically two-part clamps that include a base plate that is secured to the wall or ceiling by screws and a main plate that is supported on the base plate and is attached to a partition by screws and/or clamps. It is not uncommon for these prior art clamps to be expensive to manufacture and/or to require the use of special tools

After publishing Firebase for iOS in 2016, I decided to build something bigger, more powerful, and useful for developers. Today, we're announcing Firebase Core 2.0, with some major new features:

- * Firebase Core is now open source
- * Core is deployed as a standalone app
- * An extension of your code and data is now accessible at all times
- * Core SDK is released under the Apache License Version 2.0
- * Faster, more resilient, more secure

After almost 1 year of development, Firebase Core 2.0 is finally here, available today in the App Store. Our vision has always been to bring the full power of the Firebase realtime database and database management system to our own extensions. This means that we don't just provide an easy way to sync data, but we also help developers build custom experiences with a small amount of code.
