No Cloud service login credentials required Application setup is over before you realize, but you can choose to have it deployed on a USB flash drive as well, because it doesn't make any changes to registry entries to ensure functionality. Pay attention though, because your computer needs to be fitted with .NET Framework, but modern Windows iterations usually offer it as a default feature. As far as functionality and features go, the application's purpose is to automate file uploading to your OneDrive and Google Drive storage spaces. On the bright side of things, you are not prompted for corresponding credentials, and this is because the program uses a different approach on targeting these online storage devices. Folders synchronization can also be done offline In other words, the application requires you to select the OneDrive or Google Drive local folder, so that it simply redirects files from the monitored directory there. This leaves uploading to the existing services, which also means synchronization with actual online storage is done whenever an active Internet connection is detected, without it being mandatory for synchronization via this program. More than this, the application doesn't really check whether or not the provided Cloud folders are legitimate, which means synchronization can also be done offline between two local folders. Monitored folders can be anything on your HDD. Multiple folders can also be monitored. One neat trick can be used to monitor either the OneDrive or Google Drive to upload content to the other. Just to make things more comfortable, you can choose to have the program launched on system startup, and monitoring automatically started on launch. In conclusion Bottom line is that despite all online threats, Cloud services flourish and prove to be one of the top choices for modern storage of files. Although MakoNET CloudFolderSync can feel a little rough around the edges, its straightforward approach enables clever synchronization without additional login sessions, even between local folders. MakoNET Wireless CloudStorage is a pretty interesting and nice application to use. It will essentially do all the Internet connections on your computer as if you were in a LAN network, with respect to WiFi network connections. In other words, the application uses the Internet on your computer as if it were connected to a router, but the router is outside your house. Therefore, your router and its Internet connection won't slow down your computer at all. What's the point? Well, to avoid having to manually update all your files and folders with your online data, the application stores your files on the cloud and synchronizes them on your local computer automatically, whenever
