When I write python test.py in command line, it is OK. If I execute script in: python3 test.py it starts working with Python 2.7 (because my Mac is running on OS X 10.6.8). But when I try to execute: ./test.py it says: Permission denied So how can I make it work without installing any programs and with Python 3? A: If you are using python 3, this is what you need to do to run the script from command line: python3 test.py In my case this worked, even on a mac. A: You can also add the shebang (!) at the beginning of your script to tell the interpreter (python) to use python3 instead of python2: #!python3 You can also make this the default for any script you create: chmod +x So if you created a file called test, you would put: chmod +x test Now you can run it by simply typing: test The following background information may present examples of specific aspects of the prior art (e.g., without limitation, approaches, facts, or common wisdom) that, while expected to be helpful to further educate the reader as to additional aspects of the prior art, is not to be construed as limiting the present invention, or Folders. Icons are your best buddies. Compatible with PC and MACs. See larger Screenshots below..This invention relates generally to a system and method for transmitting a voice data stream on a plurality of channels of a digital transmission path, and more particularly to a method and system for selecting a channel and transmitting a voice data stream with minimum distortion. In digital transmission systems, it is desirable to transmit a voice data stream over a plurality of channels. This is done in order to maximize the transmission capacity of the system. Channel capacity is typically maximized by providing the maximum number of channels that can be accommodated on the transmission path. This results in a large number of channels being used, which in turn causes many problems such as echo and signal distortion. Since a voice data stream is generally perceived by the listener as a continuous signal, channel distortion and echo are serious drawbacks to transmission of voice data streams over a transmission path. Accordingly, it is necessary to provide systems which mitigate the problems associated with the transmission of voice data streams. Some prior art techniques for achieving this purpose have utilized echo control algorithms that are based on the theory of digital signal processing. However, these prior art echo control techniques suffer from a number of drawbacks such as the inability to adapt to a changing transmission environment and the inability to compensate for distortions to the signal that are not of a digital nature. Accordingly, it is desirable to provide a system and method for selecting a channel in a digital transmission path and transmitting a voice data stream with minimum distortion.
