However, little is known about the neural substrates of encoding or processing information during visual tasks in the early stage of AD. We used functional magnetic resonance imaging (fMRI) to examine the encoding and processing of simple and complex visual patterns in the primary visual cortex of 18 individuals with early AD and 18 healthy age-matched control subjects. The healthy control subjects showed significantly higher activation in the visual cortex during the encoding and processing of visual patterns, as compared to the AD subjects. For visual pattern processing, AD subjects showed no significant difference in visual cortex activation between simple and complex patterns. However, during visual pattern encoding, the AD subjects showed greater activation in the visual cortex than did the controls. These results suggest that visual encoding in AD subjects is associated with greater neural activity than is normal in the early stages of AD.8.7.11 Counting Crows (solo acoustic performance + The band) This was a great performance, the highlight of which was that the band had played 4 acoustic songs, and you could tell that Nick had been truly inspired by the band and the experience of being back on stage with the band. Nick also made the decision to go for a full show instead of a special acoustic set, the band did great, and Nick did well too! Especially considering he had only started taking voice lessons about 3 weeks prior. This would have been a perfect opportunity for a session (and a simple beginning of the project) but Nick has his hands full so the plan for the evening was a full show.The Department of Justice will reveal the political appointees in President Donald Trump's immigration agency, which has come under intense scrutiny by Democrats. The department made a formal announcement about the new positions Wednesday, telling The Washington Post that it will reveal the names of the officials in coming days. The move is part of an aggressive
