Background I've implemented a WebBrowser control in my Windows Store app. The app has a feature where the user can link to a page and the Browser control will navigate to the requested URL. The WebBrowser control uses Microsoft.Phone.Controls.Toolkit.BrowserControlBrowser to connect to the internet. Problem The default behavior of the WebBrowser control is to open a browser window when the user clicks a link. The question How can I open a child frame or dialog when the user clicks a link in the WebBrowser control? A: You can use a Window that you opened with P/Invoke in the NavigateUri event of the WebBrowser. If your WebBrowser is called Web, and the new window is called Window, then this will work: public void WebBrowser_NavigateUriChanged(object sender, WebBrowserNavigationEventArgs e) { Window frame = new Window(); frame.Navigate(e.Uri); WebBrowser.Visibility = Visibility.Collapsed; frame.Visibility = Visibility.Visible; } Award-winning comics creator Dave McKean's Y: The Last Man is an adaptation of Brian K. Harvard referencing in Microsoft Word 2007.Q: Saying "buzzing about" someone My colleague is a talker (more than 10M words per year). We are not good friends though. Often we simply say one word to each other (and that's about it). To make things worse, we talk too loudly, and it's never good to pass by each other like that. Therefore, if I were to ask him about something, I would just say "buzzing about you". I don't think that "buzzing about you" is a nice way to refer to a person. However, is it correct to say that? Or is there a better word to use? A: Buzzing about someone can be complimentary. Describe the dynamic in which there is no contact between you and your colleagues; you hear them talking about you but you have no idea what they're talking about. - f30f4ceada
