Given the time and energy dedicated to obtaining and maintaining a federal trademark registration, it's no surprise that many of us decide to take the time and perform trademark searches before applying for a trademark. But what if your search for a trademark or search for trademarks on behalf of your business discovers other marks with which you might be competing? In that case, you'll have to estimate the value of your mark to determine if you can apply or maintain your mark. However, estimating the value of your mark is not necessarily a simple process. Many factors may affect a mark's value, including: 1. The popularity of the mark Few popular trademarks obtain an initial commercial use and then leave the market. Usually, trademarks commonly used by consumers grow in market popularity as a consequence of the actions of others and economic forces. For example, a consumer may perceive a product as being associated with a particular company due to the marketing that was done on the company's behalf. While the company may not have planned for this association and may not intend to earn a royalty from its association with the mark, the consumer has already associated the mark with the company. For example, companies such as Nike and Apple use their marks as trademarks, and have built businesses and investments around them. These companies have trademarked the mark as a result of the widespread use of the mark by others. Their decisions to obtain trademark registrations create a demand for the marks that contributes to the continuing growth of the trademarks' popularity. Companies that start with a weak mark by obtaining a trademark registration are often stuck with marks that have a high commercial value that make it difficult to obtain the trademark. In these situations, identifying a mark that is distinctive and a business that has a strong need for the mark can provide a boost to the mark's value. 2. The nature of the product A product's growth in popularity can also be affected by the value placed on the product. For example, a grocery store may deem it necessary to trademark its grocery products in order to avoid being viewed 1cb139a0ed
