Is there a particular reason why one would use semicolons instead of commas to separate declarations in a C++ program, and what are the reasons? I'm trying to learn C++11 (and some C++03) and I'd like to understand its syntax. A: You use a semi-colon to separate declarations. A comma separates a list of declarations. int main() { int a; int b = 1; int c; } Semi-colons are for separating statements. Commas are for separating expressions. if (a > b) { c = a * a; printf("%d squared = %d ", c, c + a); } Commas separate the condition from the statement. The Gradient tool lets you create or edit a number of linear gradients, which can be used for a wide variety of effects. The Lens Correction filters are useful for correcting distortion in photos, both geometric and perspective distortion. The Healing Brush is great for repairing minor image defects. The Paint Bucket is good for filling in objects, removing background objects, or copying an area of pixels from one part of an image to another. The Eraser can be used for the same purpose. The Pen Tool is the Photoshop's most useful tool. For instance, it can be used to create arrows, text, bezier or polygon shapes, or any other objects from scratch. But before you start using the Pen Tool, it is important to understand how it works. How the Pen Tool Works There are two keys to using the Pen Tool. The first is to grasp the Brush tool in Photoshop. You need to grip the Tool bar at the top of the screen so that the Brush appears next to it. To use the Pen Tool, you need to click and drag the Brush and then select the option Pen from the Tools menu. After doing this, you can click anywhere in an image and draw straight lines. Once you click the Pen Tool, you see a cursor that looks like a dotted line. This cursor allows you to keep the direction and length of the line as you move the mouse over it. However, once you click the brush with your pen, the line is then created as if you had clicked the new spot with your mouse. When you click the Brush, Photoshop changes to pen mode, which you can see in the Pen tool options in the mode drop down menu. You can move the Pen Tool freely in any direction. In normal mode (T) the Pen Tool works as the Brush. After you have dragged the tool to a new position, you click the brush (or change to Pen mode with the drop down menu) and you'll see that Photoshop has replaced the cursor with the pencil that you're actually using. Click-Drag One of the biggest differences between the Brush and the Pen Tool is the Click-Drag option. When you click the Brush, Photoshop changes to the Brush Tool and it's ready for you to start creating new shapes by clicking the Brush and dragging it over your canvas. You'll notice that when you start using the Brush, a small rectangular area around the

This article was published in Free Inquiry on February 6, 2011. Scientology has long had an affinity for shabby cheap sounds and lightning fast, breathless narratives, but it is never quite as reverent or cheesy as it needs to be. In this respect, the new Vimeo video shows how film-makers cannot help themselves when they make a documentary about Scientology, and the result is an avant-rock epic at once over-dramatic and under-directed and just plain unpleasant to watch. It's set to the tune of the old-fashioned zombie song "Bad to the Bone," with Danny Elfman soundtrack alterations. The various scenes are dispensed in quick succession, almost as if the video is a "new version" of a well-known, old video. The first part shows a speech delivered by Scientology's Xenu nemesis Mike Rinder. Rinder has an ear-to-ear grin, and his booming bass, which you can almost imagine rising from his diaphragm, cuts through the miasma of bad metaphors. His words are, basically, a rap about the evils of the free will and the need for indoctrination. The second part retells the story of Xenu, but in a much more literal sense. A big movie-style Xenu threatens to destroy the earth by sending "evil monsters" and "alien zombies" from the sky. All the while, the narrator, wearing headphones, jokes and gags with them. They're clearly a gift from the "audience," and the audience gets frequent ear checks. Is it a joke? Some kind of a test? When the audience jumps or bangs the stage, the narrator responds as if he were a health care professional to a patient. "Here, take this, it'll help." The third and last part is a typical case history, and I know this because I've conducted a number of of these. It begins with a subject reading his account of being brought to Scientology. It is blunt and simple and, just like the sound of Xenu himself, almost deafening. It is not very professional at all. After this is presented, the subject's girlfriend reads from the Guardian's Office manual, The Voluntary Surrender. She is more skilled and patient than her boyfriend. She is also pleasant and friendly. She even smiles, when she passes a smile test. The video ends with a charlady who is obviously an
