Adding text and annotations:* Creating text in Photoshop requires prior knowledge of, and training in, the Adobe Character and Type tools, as well as an understanding of the Blob Tool. You need to write text, then paint it on an image and move it as needed. Annotation is the process of writing important information on an image and then connecting it to the image with `_layers_` that are turned on and visible. Organizing layers:* Layers give you a way to organize and keep track of all the parts of an image. Without them, you'd have to open up multiple images, and then find the part of an image that you want and make a copy or move it to another file. The process can be time consuming and tedious. Adding filters, effects, and adjustment layers:* Filters, effects, and adjustment layers can add layers of modifications or transformations to your images. Combining and saving images: After you work on a group of images, it's often convenient to combine the images and save them in a new file. You may want to divide your combined image into a group of layers. You can then save one or more of those layers as a Photoshop file format that allows you to export the image as a single image or as a separate file. # MORE ABOUT LAYERS Layers are an integral part of Photoshop and are considered the superhighway of image editing. Layers are one of the most useful features of Photoshop because they enable you to make various adjustments, modify images in many ways, and easily create new files. In the following section, we discuss layers and how to turn them on and off in Photoshop. # ACTIVATE LAYERS When you open an image, it typically has one or more layers already turned on. By `_turning a layer on_`, you enable that layer. If you turn a layer off, you disable that layer and remove the effects of that layer from the previous image. You can `_duplicate_` or `_copy_` a layer if you want to make a second layer with the same effect of the original layer, or you can `_edit_` a layer to make changes to it.

South African Wood The South African Forest Products industry is the fourth largest in Africa. It is on par with the small wine industry in Portugal. It is estimated to be worth R6.2 billion and employs around 3 million people. It is a largely unstructured and informal industry that mainly relies on raw materials coming from the forest and its environment and leaving the country for export abroad. South Africa imports all the wood based products that it needs from other countries, mainly India, Morocco, Indonesia and Pakistan. The industry came into prominence during the nineteenth century when the Boers settled in the area and saw timber as a raw material which was hard to find in Europe. The industry began to grow rapidly in the twentieth century when the Apartheid policy forced the black majority of South Africans to leave the country, most of them settling in townships in the western Cape and northern KwaZulu Natal. These areas were removed from the production of timber and agricultural activities increased due to the government's desire to expand the agricultural industry. Nowadays the industry covers all parts of the world, from all the regions of Africa, Asia and the Middle East. South Africa has played a key role in the development of the wood industry. It opened its doors to foreign trade in the late 19th century, eventually developing into a major importer of wood and wood related products. The country spends around R750 million on the industry each year. South African timber products are exported to many countries, including the UK, the USA, Germany and the United Arab Emirates. This post has been put together for readers and enthusiasts of the Wood. It presents a good look at the development of the South African wood industry during the past two centuries, as well as the main wood products it produces today. South African Wood in the 1800s The South African economy in 1871 was on a high, thanks to the rapid development of the country's mining industry and its involvement in the international diamond and gold markets. The industry was booming and South Africans in general were showing an interest in "improving" the quality of life for the black communities. During the period 1870-1890, the South African military employed their considerable skills in building their own iron boats and gunboats, during this period they also built wooden schooners and hulks. Wooden sailing ships were an important element of the economy from the very beginning. Up to this point, people had been using timber to build their
