I know I need to learn some new stuff but I am having trouble getting the hang of f-stops. I have just been putting the camera on auto all the time and just lately noticed my images are coming out to have a brighter white than I would like. Do I need to change my settings on my camera? Should I be shooting in RAW??? Sorry I'm a newbie so any help would be appreciated. I came here looking for some info regarding the d80—is it worth keeping your lens open for longer exposures when using aperture settings that are A LOT smaller than f/11? I'm talking 4-6 stops smaller. So, say I take a 25 second exposure, is it better to have the lens open the whole time or will it be too difficult to keep my eye on it and concentrate during a portrait shot? Hello, I am looking for a good exercise DVD for my Nikon D80. I want to use the Nikon Portrait Pack Kit, but I also want to take the portraits in a certain place, the type of weight lifting I want to do, and also how I want to exercise the camera (setting up my pose, etc.). I would like the DVD to take me through each of these steps, and I want to be able to watch the DVD while I'm doing the exercises. Do you know of any? I have a question regarding setting up the image in the camera. I am new to the D80 and recently took a portrait with lightroom and got some great color in the back of the picture. Now I am wondering why it looks so much better with lightroom? It's not just image manipulation. I feel that I am not getting the best results when I take the same image and set it up in Photoshop with adjustments. How can I improve this situation? Thanks I am new to the D80 and have been shooting a few portraits. I know I have to get my exposure correct before I start adding the filters. I am trying to figure out how to

Calcium and magnesium oxalate enhancement in a urine sample has been observed with stains containing cationic surfactants, for example, those with amine functionality. Urine typically contains many cationic surfactants, mainly used as disinfectants in medical applications. Certain soaps, detergents and deodorants also contain these surfactants. The presence of such surfactants gives rise to fluorescent stains which may interfere with the results obtained in medical diagnostic assays. In such assays, the urinary calcium-oxalate crystals should be stained clearly and uniformly, because the fluorescent agents stain the crystals only, but the background fluorescence is low. Precise tests for urinary calcium oxalate crystals, such as the Ruppel's and Hageman's tests, are increasingly being used to determine the presence of calcium oxalate crystaluria, which may be an early indication of certain kidney disorders. Also, other calcium crystaluria tests based on calcium oxalate crystals are known in the art. Thus, Canadian Patent No. 2,047,811 (Howell et al.) discloses a method of producing a calcium oxalate monohydrate crystal suspension which is retained in a matrix of calcium oxalate salts, but which may be stained using a fluorescent dye. Canadian Patent No. 2,300,163 (Bates et al.) discloses a method of producing a calcium oxalate crystal suspension which is retained in a matrix of calcium oxalate salts, but which may be stained using a fluorochrome to enhance calcium oxalate crystal visualization. In addition, U.S. Pat. No. 5,459,115 (Teitgen et al.) and U.S. Pat. No. 5,712,277 (Letko et al.) disclose a method of producing a calcium oxalate crystal suspension which is retained in a matrix of calcium oxalate salts, but which may be stained using a fluorescing dye to enhance calcium oxalate crystal visualization. However, there still exists a need for additional methods and staining compositions which may be employed in the analysis of urine. Moreover, there is a need for additional methods of altering the physical or chemical properties of crystal suspensions. It is an object of the present invention to provide a novel method for the analysis of urine for the presence of calcium oxalate crystals. It is another object of the present invention to provide a novel method of modifying the color
