, "unlucky for us, we have that source". Lucky for us we have a way to prove the validity of the source. This may be an egg-on-face moment for the non-naysayers but - Open Source is still considered to be an experimental process by many - with no guarantee in its future development. You want to try it? Fine. But you don't expect a free ride, should something go wrong - and it may. If you don't see the value in what I am saying - so be it. But if your subjectivity is saying 'where is the "value" in open source?' it is important to note the follow-up - it is not just the "cost". The "benefits" are a significant part of it. When you take "open source" as a "free ride" it is providing something that is available for free elsewhere, but the online availability not being tested for service, maintainability, and quality. If a closed source vendor makes a mistake, they - usually - can at least address it. If an open source vendor makes a mistake - well, you get what you pay for. No one likes it - but that's the price. If you want to "beat that" - the Red Hat mentality needs to change. While I have no idea what their strategy is (if one even exists) - they have always been more willing to face the consequences of their product than competitors. In other words - they have the attitude that sometimes things go wrong - and that is OK. With an OSS vendor - what happens is a consequence of the forces at work - not a consequence of the vendor having made poor product decisions. The key here is that they strive to make things right even after making the bad decision. With an OSS vendor - you have no guarantee that will happen, but with Red Hat - you do. You can learn how to deal with it, and you can also put your resources towards working with those who make the mistakes so that they can fix them for you. You know that you are dealing with "real" people. Open source vendors do "real" work. They understand what they are doing - and that is often a bigger difference than just the quality of what they deliver. Yes, but that does not answer the question of the "value" in open source. Back to the question - the value is in the fact that it is a completely different model
