Root hairs were produced by the agathis plant, giant interlocking moss in its natural habitat in the calcareous desert. Aggregates of over one hundred root hairs were typically observed. An algorithm was devised to simulate the time evolution of the complex pattern by randomizing the positions of the seed of the root hair. The distribution of the areas of the root hairs is generally accepted to follow a power law, and it was the aim of this study to test whether a simple power law can adequately describe the pattern. The results suggest that (i) the data follow a power law, (ii) the distribution appears to be robust, (iii) the index which characterizes the distribution is not sensitive to the value of the factor k, and (iv) the distribution for the aggregate areas is indistinguishable from the distribution for the root hair areas. Ask HN: Are there any good online programming tools? - eslaz Hi guys.I'm a french student and I want to start a project, while I would like it to be as open as possible. I'm thinking about starting a website, asking people to contribute code and then organize this in a git 1c0b3666d
