carrie to download from behind the scenes will pull a video from QuickTime, or YouTube, or whatever else you put in the query string. The rest of the string you supply will be passed as a parameter to the video. (I suspect that the method will, in addition, also automatically parse the "pretty" text before it gets to the client.) There will be two ways to use this on the client side: A server-side renderer A non-server-side renderer The server-side renderer is a normal video tag that uses this method. A non-server-side renderer is any C# or HTML 5 library that wants to pass that rest of the query string to the video tag. Let's look at the two ways to use this. The Server-Side Renderer server-side renderer The simplest is a HTML form. The server-side renderer can be specified in one of two ways: either as a server-side form handler that can render in whatever language you want, or it can just be a .NET application that renders the HTML. The server-side renderer is a simple form handler. It accepts three parameters from the client: a parameter named "url" where you put the video URL to be played a parameter named "pretty" containing a URL with the "pretty" text sent to the server in the query string a parameter named "querystring" containing any other query string parameters sent to the server HTML with server-side renderer. Client-Side Renderer client-side renderer Any C# or HTML 5 library can include this. The only downside is you have to modify the HTML page that is loaded by the "pretty" text. HTML 5 changes the way that query strings work. The first problem is you have to be able to specify which query string you want to handle the key value pair's. The second problem is that you can have duplicate keys. Because of this, the client-side renderer usually uses a simple object to parse the parameters from the query string and generates a "pretty" URL from the server-side renderer. HTML with client-side renderer. Summary Putting It All Together Putting it all together to make a working page is pretty easy. The HTML 595f342e71
