The show has

her daughter — and, yes, Alicia did say some hurtful things about Rachel. But this time, Alicia is talking about getting her daughter back. With Kalinda, Diane, Cary, and eventually Julian she feels that she's gotten where she needs to be, and she doesn't need to be angry anymore. She's finally able to appreciate what she's achieved, and to the point of Alicia being able to let go of the past so that she can make peace with it. After all, she doesn't have to return to the law firm she left years ago, and she can let her future be her own. This is certainly a moment for Alicia, and it's a great payoff for the season. As a result, it's a great
