An assumption of your statement is that all the people who are now in these houses will be moving out (or at least out of the immediate area of the flood zone), because after all they are "leaving" the area. The people who live in the house did not do so voluntarily. They weren't hired and signed a lease, didn't pay a lot of rent, and they don't get a lot of "benefits" from the area that their house is in, though that may be part of the reason why they chose to live there. Now, I'm sure that there are people who live in this area for a variety of reasons who will be moving out in the next few weeks. You can just assume for the sake of arguments that the people who left voluntarily will be moving out. That's a good assumption. However, to assume that all people who live in the flood zone will be leaving voluntarily, the same way you might assume that all the tenants at a low income apartment will be moving out voluntarily is not a good assumption. It's reasonable to assume that many tenants were able to move in because they were qualified for housing subsidies. They were qualified to live in an apartment because they could afford their rent. Once they find out that they won't be able to afford their rent, they will have two options: they can find a way to move to an alternate location for better housing, or they can leave their apartments. If the reason they're in a flood zone has nothing to do with the housing they're in, they may choose to leave the area. If I lived in the flood zone, I'd want to know that a flood is coming sooner rather than later, because that would give me a few weeks to get things ready. I'd want to know that the flood would come without a high warning, so I can get in out of the flood zone as soon as possible, and not have to waste time waiting for a "high" warning. I'd want
