is how to fix this?Q: Two function pointers I want to implement two different function pointers that point to the same function and I don't want to use class which has same functions. void (*pA)() = doSomething1; void (*pB)() = doSomething2; Now I want to execute those two function pointers: void (f)() = pA; f(); And, I want that these two function pointers will work with only one source file. I don't want to use #ifdef statement and I don't want to hard-code the functions. A: Put a virtual function in the base class and choose to override it in each derived class. A: You can use a template and inheritance. template struct SP { F1 f1; SP(F1 f) :f1(f) {} void call(){ f1(); } }; template struct SPB : SP { F2 f2; SPB(F2* f) :SP(f), f2(f) {} void call(){ f2(); } }; SPB s(new SPB(new void())); s.call(); // calls second function UPDATE: I've just noticed that this does not work when using the constructors - I think we have to use the copy/move constructors as these are effectively perfect forwards.
