To develop and evaluate a soft-learning model of common forms of infantile spasms (IS) and help in the clinical management of children with IS. We used logistic regression analyses to construct a machine-learning model of common forms of IS and applied this model to four new, independent datasets from unrelated centers to validate the model. Children with IS were evaluated at centers in China, Japan, and the United States between 2007 and 2015. We developed a soft-learning model of common forms of IS. The model was applied to four independent datasets from the United States and other countries. A soft-learning model of common forms of IS. Overall, the model had an area under the receiver operating characteristic curve (AUROC) of 0.854. This was higher than for other IS models (AUROCs of 0.816, 0.762, 0.774, and 0.764 from the four centers, respectively). Application of the model to four independent datasets demonstrated good agreement with all centers (AUROCs of 0.868, 0.875, 0.852, and 0.837, respectively). The top two features from this model were motor manifestations and the presence of hypsarhythmia on electroencephalography. The soft-learning model demonstrated good accuracy in predicting common forms of IS (based on AUROCs of 0.816, 0.762, 0.774, and 0.764, respectively). Similar to the d0c515b9f4
