Cerebrospinal fluid (CSF) testing is one of the commonstest-types of analysis performed in clinical laboratories. Manual processing of large volumes of CSF is a slow, error-prone process. Recently, automated processors (APs) have emerged as an alternative to traditional manual processing. We report the overall clinical performance of an AP designed to process large numbers of CSF samples. Four sets of randomly selected CSF samples were processed in parallel: (1) manually, (2) with a multiphasic CSF-QUE processor (multiphasic4.0; Diagnostics Products Corporation, Horsham, PA) that operates according to diphasic principles and yields two CSF aliquots, and (3) with a single-phase CSF-QUE processor, and (4) with the analyzer, the Advia 2120 (Siemens Medical Solutions, Deerfield, IL). A total of 19,140 samples were processed. The AP had a mean turnaround time (TAT) of 5.9 hours and a mean (median) processing time of 9.7 minutes (6 minutes) for CSF. Specificity was 99.9% for total cell count, 98.1% for protein, and 96.9% for glucose.
