The senior mass communication major at Northeastern's Peabody College is enthusiastic about her new career, which she imagines "a bit like being an astronaut, except without being hot and sweaty and there's no gravity." Pailskar is indeed suited for her new occupation, having spent the previous four years as one of the school's first-ever undergraduates to pioneer the use of wearable technology in the classroom. From April to June of this year, she will be on the move for 12 days, with five or six classes a day—this at a time of year when the sun stays out for only about 60 hours a week. Pailskar will follow a meticulous schedule of classes throughout the day, then log a full night's sleep on the rooftop of the Illinois Institute of Technology building next to the school. With her efforts focused on a single school, her mom, Donna Pailskar, saw a list of several available jobs. She put her daughter on the track for the rooftops, fully aware of the risks: she had seen TV and movies featuring people falling from high-rise buildings, or parachuting toward buildings from a plane. Still, she envisioned her daughter being "an icon to her generation" while paying her college tuition. It was an uphill battle: Pailskar is one of the 8.5 million Americans without a bachelor's degree, and she comes from a poor family where four generations had graduated from college. She needed to overcome doubters, who noted that for a career to be successful, she should concentrate on one field of study. "She needed to be seen," her mother recalls, "as a mass communication major with honors." At Peabody, Pailskar found

It has long been a goal of nuclear reactor designers to provide means for removal of fuel elements from a reactor core, in order to provide for post-catastrophic replacement of the fissile material, and for routine maintenance of a reactor core. The problem to which this invention is directed is that of providing a structure which assures rapid and easy removal of individual fuel elements from a nuclear reactor core, without permitting unwanted outflow of radioactive materials from the core. In the past, a variety of fuel removal methods have been proposed, including the use of mechanical mechanisms and automatic means for handling such mechanisms; the use of mechanical systems to raise the whole fuel element, to mechanically

To investigate the incidence of atopic dermatitis and the prevalence of its associated diseases in the region of Abruzzo, Italy. The study was designed as a cross-sectional descriptive study. In a 1-year period, all the hospitalized patients for dermatological diseases (defined as codes 61-63 in ICD-9) were included. Hospital admission data were searched for the diagnosis of atopic dermatitis and other associated conditions (asthma, food allergies and eosinophilia). In the year 2000 there were 234 hospital admissions for dermatological diseases in the region of Abruzzo, with a mean age of 4.8 years (SD +/- 2.8). There was a significant male preponderance (69.5%). The most common diagnosis was chronic eczema, diagnosed in 180 cases (76.3%) and atopic dermatitis in 79 cases (33.7%). Two hundred and fifty-three cases of atopic dermatitis (98.9%) were associated with other atopic manifestations. The children were most commonly affected in the first year of life. The most common associated condition was eosinophilia (93.7% of cases with atopic dermatitis), followed by asthma (42.2%), food allergies (17.1%) and anaphylactic reactions (12.2%). The high prevalence of the different disease associations suggests a common genetic predisposition. The cases with eosinophilia were older than the other atopic children. This study represents the first cohort of patients with atopic dermatitis in southern Italy. The results of the study emphasize the high prevalence of atopic dermatitis in the Abruzzese area and its systemic associations. the complaint, which was duly filed, in the new case.
