Credit: Andrew Chan at UQ New research by a team of scientists from the University of Queensland has created a virtual model of the eye that provides an unprecedented level of detail about the delicate structure of the organ responsible for focusing the light onto the retina of the eye. The study, published in Nature Scientific Reports, will assist with optical treatment strategies for complex eye conditions such as retinal detachments, macular degeneration and glaucoma. In the paper, Associate Professor Andrew Chan, the study's corresponding author, and researchers from the Biomedical Optics Research Laboratory (BORL) at UQ, explain how the research could provide new insights into the eye that can be used in visual treatment strategies, such as cochlear implants for people with hearing loss and cataracts surgery for people with poor vision. Professor Chan from the UQ School of Chemistry and Molecular Biosciences and BORL said using this technology to help understand how the human eye works and being able to replicate it using virtual models provides a ground to develop strategies to treat complex eye conditions. "The new mathematical model we have developed is extremely accurate when it comes to predicting the shape of the human eye and its ability to focus light," Professor Chan said. "We're now investigating how this technology can be used to understand how the eye works. We hope to be able to use this approach to develop strategies to prevent eye conditions or to treat them more effectively, such as techniques to repair damaged eyes." Professor Chan said the model is freely available to use and can be integrated within other software packages, such as CAD software, allowing researchers to more accurately model the eye before developing new treatment strategies. "By having access to an accurate model, we can go through the steps to determine the most effective treatment options, such as laser photocoagulation or new surgical techniques, which could have a real impact on the way we treat patients with complex eye conditions," Professor Chan said. 648931e174
