is the cornerstone of current HIV prevention technologies, providing a platform for superior clinical efficacy, but it has not reached the scale of its benefits, and cannot be scaled to the level of coverage needed for many high-risk populations. NAT is used to test blood samples for the presence of HIV, and also provides a means to screen blood for all diseases, including viruses associated with transfusion-transmissible infections (e.g. hepatitis C virus). The technologies available for NAT vary widely in sensitivity, throughput, and cost, including polymerase chain reaction (PCR), and real-time PCR and nucleic acid sequence-based amplification (NASBA). The PCR based protocols are the most expensive, but are more sensitive, and are the most commonly used. NASBA is the least expensive, but is considerably less sensitive
