But how can they monitor a billion global users? Are there appropriate tools? It's a big challenge but regulators are trying to deal with it. The US has been tightening rules. The UK's internet regulator, the ICO, says there is a "clear responsibility" for social platforms to "monitor and report content that breaches the law". Global crackdown While guidelines on content are important, it is important not to confuse legal with illegal. In Britain, people have raised concerns about a practice known as "tag swapping" - where people alter the content of photographs to make a political or social comment. The ICO says it will be clamping down on people who use this technique to make pro-Nazi and anti-Semitic comments. It's part of a clampdown on inappropriate content by the regulator. In the last year it has fined social media platforms £400,000 after it identified comments by the likes of Donald Trump and Boris Johnson. Image copyright Getty Images Image caption The ICO has fined Facebook £400,000 over graphic material posted on users' pages The ICO says this activity leads to "hateful and provocative messages, with a number of posts associated with direct incitement to terrorist acts". In the US, a number of highly publicised cases of hate crime have shown how people can have their lives affected by their social media presence. And if you see evidence of hate speech in live streams? You can report it to Facebook. The company says if it is reported to it, it will "take action to stop the abuse and remove any content or accounts that violate our Community Standards". Self-regulation While the UK is looking to the social media platforms for help, US social media sites operate under the principle of self-regulation. This is in line with the US Senate's announcement in June that it wants to start giving the FBI more oversight of internet companies to get to the bottom of terrorist activities. The Senate has also called on the social media companies to agree to requests from the Department of Homeland Security to share information, and allow the government to hold onto this information d0c515b9f4
