This question is actually for business purposes, not programming purposes. The problem I am working on is creating something that is a user-centric information sharing system. I've already defined several high level concepts and am now designing the model/view/controller to implement them. I know design patterns are a general concept that doesn't always apply to programming so I am currently researching how I can apply the concepts I am learning in the context of business (as opposed to programming). In the last paragraph of my question, I was saying that I am in the process of designing an information sharing system and am looking to apply user-centric design patterns, but one that is easier to implement given the constraints of business. How should I tag the question? MVC? Design pattern? What else should I tag? A: I would say design pattern is out of scope for this site as we only focus on software development. I suggest you look into the StackExchange sites that focus on design patterns. A search result of the StackExchange site you are interested in is given in the left hand column. A: As far as I know, these tags don't fit the question. MVC is the name of the architecture model, more specifically, the terms are used to refer to the following concepts: the controller pattern the view model pattern the model-view-controller pattern UNPUBLISHED UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE FOURTH CIRCUIT No. 01-7563 JERRY L.
