Note Before you get started altering the color of an image, however, read Understanding Palette Colors, which describes how to view and manipulate color in the Photoshop workspace. You can select a color from the color palette or paint over an image with the photo-editing tools. Selecting an image's color is as simple as clicking a color in the color palette and then using the Color Picker tool, shown in Figure 6-1, to select a color. If you want to use the color picker to change more than one color, you can pick two colors at once. Click the Color Picker button at the bottom of the toolbar to enter the Color Picker, shown in Figure 6-1, and drag your cursor over a color in the image. Click outside the image to close the color picker. Click each color in the palette and then click the image again to apply that color to the image. (You can also use keyboard shortcuts or the context menu to make color changes.) Figure 6-1. To choose a color from

Barrington, D. Date and time: Sunday, 17 January 2013 12:00-13:00, Room 6.00/6.30 Professor Barrington, whose pioneering theoretical work on language acquisition have been seminal in psycholinguistics, will discuss the factors that shape a language acquisition community in a small locality. She will focus on the process of language acquisition in young children in the close social and physical environment in which they live. this is the "deal" that they were so stunned by? A deal that will see taxpayers picking up the tab for the next 50 years, until the time that major repair/renovation projects start, while the taxpayer becomes a source of revenue for the school corporation. As such, does this sound to you like a great deal for the students in Seattle Public Schools? The money was lost by the MPS. You want to blame the city of Seattle for blowing the money? As for the students, unless you've been living in a cave, you know that three years ago their attendance rates were not good and their graduation rates were still less than 50%. You haven't been to the elementary schools lately, have you? The classrooms are crowded! The kids just can't get a seat and they literally line up down the halls! How could 50 years at the same rate of spending not fix that? The students, with their better attendance and graduation rates, would have been better off today. As for the class sizes, while some schools have those huge classes that appear to be teacher-less, all but the lowest performing schools have classes of less than 25. So at my neighborhood school I currently teach an 11-12 class and would likely be teaching a class of

9-10 in three years. I've been to a high school in the past and seen these classes with 25 students or more. I've also seen the "teacher-less classrooms" and as a teacher myself I know how much I would get out of that. When teachers are working they should be working with good technology and I'm sure their students would be as well. However, this whole program smacks of a long

Q: Passing data to a Content Script in Chrome I'm having trouble with content scripts in Chrome. All other browsers are fine with it. I can inject scripts into the page, however, I am having trouble sending messages to the page from my script. I'm using a chrome extension to open a form on the page. The form saves its information to a MySQL database, and then I'd like to be able to send the data to my content script. Here's what I'm doing: `chrome.tabs.create({url:'mypage.php'}, function(tab) { chrome.tabs.executeScript(tab.id, {file: 'js/myfunc.js'}); });` I tried injecting the script, but that didn't work. If anyone could suggest how I can do this, it would be much appreciated. A: Ok. So I figured out that you can't send data from a content script to an existing tab. Therefore, I had to switch to a background script, which runs at startup. More info here: [ORLANDO, Fla. - A Florida airline employee was fired this month after she allegedly was caught on video giving up a seat to a service dog. WKMG reports that it obtained a copy of the footage, which includes audio of the woman. The video shows her lifting the service dog up by her neck to clear a row of seats, as the passenger and her family began to complain.
