Silicon Valley Internet giant Yelp Inc. is on the move in a way it hasn't been for two decades. Last week the company's chief executive, Jeremy Stoppelman, outlined a three-year plan to radically change its business and become a classified-ad company that issues digital currencies rather than just a directory listing website. "It's a sea change in approach," said Adam Levin, a partner at Santa Clara law firm Levin Papantonio. Yelp, which has been working on its plans since Stoppelman arrived in 2011, said Tuesday it's in the midst of closing its initial public offering, which would be the company's largest to date, and had $210 million in the bank as of September. Stoppelman's vision of Yelp for the 21st century, one that he 1cdb36666d
