In FIFA, every player's AI reacts realistically to the players on the pitch and are more prone to making fatal mistakes and throwing away simple opportunities due to their gameplay loop. It is possible in this game to use a player's real-life movement to enhance AI instincts, which in turn, allows for more intelligent gameplay. This technology will allow players to use their actual movements from their real life in game, either as an assist to change the AI tactics or as a tool to detect dangerous situations. For example, an AI manager may give instructions or make tactical changes based on a player's movements during one specific situation in a match or game. This brand new innovation allows players to use their bodies and movements in FIFA 22 as a tool to play in a more realistic and intelligent way. In the video below, you will notice Real Madrid superstar, Cristiano Ronaldo, demonstrating this tool. To have your player using "HyperMotion" technology, simply set their HyperMotion value to "+1" in the Player Data Interface: After doing that, you will have a new, purple highlighted attribute called "HyperMotion". The attribute determines if a player has real-life movement data. When enabled, use the player and navigate to their in-game attributes (Player Data Interface) to change the "HyperMotion" value to +1, as shown in the picture below. To enable "HyperMotion" technology to apply to your players in FIFA 22, select "Use Player Data Interface" in the Attributes menu. Play Along with Your Players You are not only going to see the real life movements of your players, but you are also going to see realistic behaviors when they are under pressure in the final third. For example, your teammate, Meunier, will more likely to shoot when he is not under pressure in the box. Alternatively, if your teammate, Firmino, is under pressure and is surrounded by red shirts, he will over-commit himself to try and find a way out of the tough situation. The opponent will react in an intelligent way and try to change the direction of play to prevent the player from finding that out.
