The new motion system delivers a “more realistic and natural gameplay experience,” according to the developer, which is “designed to deliver a more authentic and complete football experience.” Created in collaboration with the UEFA Player Movement Study & Analysis team, the system aims to deliver a more “natural movement pattern and feel,” enabling the player to move naturally in match situations, and achieve the “unparalleled speed and muscle memory that real players have when playing a real match.” The system captures and analyses “hundreds of data points,” such as movement, acceleration and top speed, to deliver “accurate and dynamic player movement responses,” enabling players to do more with less physical effort. Tackle reactions, technique, team positions, player positions, ball recovery and positioning are all refined through the new motion system, according to developer EA Sports. As mentioned, the new in-game system can be applied to a number of different game modes, including normal and realistic gameplay, as well as coaches’ and referee modes. It is also designed to deliver “realistic, computer-generated crowd reactions,” enabling the game to replicate how an audience responds to a game and the reactions of the players to that audience. Another new feature for FIFA 22 is hyper localisation, which will deliver “exact player positioning and location,” replicating the experiences players would have in a real match. The new motion system is perhaps the most significant feature in FIFA 22, and is the key to all the other new features that were revealed in this year’s iteration of the popular football simulation. As the first game with the new technology, FIFA 22 promises to deliver “the most authentic football gaming experience to date,” according to the developer. It will also see a range of game improvements, with new ways to play, including “a skill-based skill training system that provides greater choice and control over progression,” as well as new player and squad management features. There is also “better gameplay,” with changes to ball physics and ball conduction and a re-tuned passing model. There will also be an “improved engine,” with “more realistic player models and animations,” as well as “better grass physics.◆

The one-two striker partnership that has defined the Premier League has long been a staple of the top tier but the advent of a 4-2-3-1 system with two advanced midfielders has seen the use of a deadly partnership between a traditional number nine and a forward moving as far back as No10. This has brought about some bizarre formations and downright hazardous situations for defences and managers alike, with shot makers moving almost regimental distances to either side of the penalty box
