• Create your own game plays with millions of other players. • Collaborate with other creators to build amazing games. • Play games with friends or the entire world. Over the past decade, the gaming industry has struggled greatly due to the lackluster performances of the major video game companies. The causes of this drop can be seen in many areas, such as a shift toward mobile gaming and the financial and legal problems of some publishers. This drop in revenue has forced many of the major game companies to cut back on their game development budgets, and even to terminate some of their in-development titles. They began to rely on selling mobile games and quickly released their game development to other companies that could accomplish the job quicker and for a cheaper price. The most prominent company that has adopted this practice is the major gaming company, Nintendo. Other major companies that adopted the practice were Sony and Sega, which sold their publishing operations to Sony and Sega respectively. Nintendo, however, kept the publishing house they had. The result of these changes was the creation of a series of other companies that published the games that Nintendo had planned. Nintendo's own video game development division has not been affected by this shift in gaming priorities, and they continue to develop for current systems and produce new handhelds for the Nintendo Switch console. Nintendo is still one of the major game companies in the world. Currently, Nintendo is the only major game company that has kept its publishing operations, although they do not yet have a hand in game development. Instead, they have created a new division under their EAD division and have worked with other third-party companies to have the games developed and published by these companies. This has led to the rise of a new type of game company called a "third-party developer," or TPD. Unlike the companies that traditionally published games, these companies create games that are done by other companies. This allows the developers to focus solely on game design and easily produce different game genres. The biggest advantage of these new companies is the easy accessibility of their games to the public. Nintendo is the most notable of these companies, and has now adopted a business model that has made these games a source of revenue for the company. These new businesses have made games available to the public in two ways: physical and digital. The physical version is a method of distribution that relies on physical goods to be distributed to the public. The digital version is a computer that contains a program that the public can download and use to play games. This creates
