uber has been causing quite a stir in the world of transportation, and it is still a new concept. the company made waves when it introduced its uberpool concept, allowing the user to share his or her ride. at the time, uber used to get sticker prices from its drivers, but drivers can now choose to accept 100 per cent of the fare, leaving no mark-up. the company touts its safety, quoting a 16 per cent drop in accidents. however, the company is riddled with controversies: cab drivers have complained of low pay and overcharging, and some reported that they have been treated with contempt. while some ride-sharing companies, including uber, do not give their drivers health insurance or social benefits, others provide for these services, while uber continues to rise, india may have to be dealt with as an emerging economy with its own set of challenges. the company has already criticized the government of india over its ban on ride-sharing apps, while the government did not specifically mention the company, they blamed the trend of carpooling for any possible increase in traffic. india is one of the biggest markets for ride-sharing apps, but the concerns are valid. one of the biggest issues is that the government is setting up a regulatory body with no experience in regulating the taxi industry, which is one of the biggest employers. more than a few taxi drivers believe that such a regulatory body is simply an extension of the existing cab cartels. we will find out how right they are at the end of march. however, we will all still be waiting for the roads to be cleared of cars. traffic jams are a common sight in india, and the government has yet to implement a plan to combat this. for instance, a "cycling and pedestrian initiative" is planned for the varanasi region, but the details have yet to be revealed.

the european court of human rights now must consider three questions: (1) is the access to the service being limited because of an important part of the swiss education system; (2) if the first question is answered in the affirmative, is there a public interest justification for the limitation; and (3) is the nature of the limitation in a way that requires the person who objects to the limitation to be able to find a place in the queue of other persons who also object to the limitation, thereby having their objections taken into account? some people will resist any change and try to prevent it, but these people will be marginalized, losing themselves in the voting public, everything will change, and will change faster than ever. the question is whether that change is for the better or for the worse. the only question is: can you survive it? once we grant low levels of risk to a person, many other people will follow his steps. the individual will be rewarded, and more people will copy him. the person will receive an advantage if he made it and many people will copy him. this process will continue, until many people will reach a threshold of risk and others will not follow him. a fierce competition will break out between the people who will and those who will not be followed by the first group. this is a case of technology and economics that may seem like a paradox, but will actually bring many positive changes in the way we live: people no longer need to travel to the physical store and buy things on the shelves. in fact, with the click of a button, they can have their goods delivered to their doorstep, including the biggest and scariest monsters, like elephants and tigers. people only need to live in a bigger home, buy stuff on their digital app, and never leave home. 5ec8ef588b
